I'm gonna want to talk to the EPA this afternoon:

*Can you walk me through this a little bit: After you approve standards, how does the EPA play a role in enforcement if something comes up?

*what has been your experience with tribal water standards: Have there been other cases where a large potential project off the reservation is threatened because of tribal standards for air or water.

*in the case of the Bad River, are there standards stricter than the state's?

*How do you deal with narrative standards – is this more difficult to approve or enforce than numeric?

*a little history: Mole Lake won a SC case on this issue – were they first to get this authority?

*could you tell me about this issue of air quality and how it could potentially affect parties as much as 60 miles away?

Lee -- I had a chance to talk to our Water Division director and staff and they said that the sort of questions you asked me about the Bad River tribe's water quality standards would be better answered by the tribe. The contact there is Naomi Tilloson, 715-682-7123.

They didn't know whether the Supreme Court case regarding Mole Lake was the first test case on tribal standards. Do you have other questions that are more federal in nature?
